

XAN PADRON

I focus on time and place, and that is always changing... As a street photographer, I love to think about my work as some sort of sociological portraits, focusing on the street as a social space. The public spaces in our cities somehow become the theater of social life. Even within the same city, different neighborhoods have their own identity and the same street can feel totally different depending on the moment of the day you are in and, of course, the season you are in. I try to portrait all those changes. There is the rhythm of a place, the colors, the sense of direction, the energy of that day, of that moment... that is what truly fascinates me. And of course, after all these years working on the Time Lapse series, seeing how our relationship with ourselves and with the space changes through the seasons has also been a fascinating journey.
